1. Course Description

This course aims at introducing the main aspects of government and politics in China -- the People's Republic of China (PRC). The emphasis will be a historical and comparative description of the governmental institutions, political culture, political party -- the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), leadership, ideology, and other critical issues of policy-making in China. A central question especially deserves our attention: how different is China's politics?

There is no special requirement for this course except a willingness to read, think, and learn. The class will be organized as a seminar with a clear emphasis on having an extensive classroom participation of the students.

An effort of following the current events in the PRC is strongly encouraged. Publications such as The New York Times, The Washington Post, and the South China Morning Post as well as the web-based news services list below are good sources for up-to-date information of China:

China Digital Times: <http://chinadigitaltimes.net>

China Media Project: <http://cmp.hku.hk>

China Watch: <http://www.telegraph.co.uk/sponsored/china-watch/>

2. Course Requirements

Requirement	Marks	(%)
Participation/Attendance	100	10
First test	200	20
Presentation	100	10
Reading Reports	100	10
First test	200	20
Paper	300	30
Total	1,000	100

Presentation will be a research project exploring one aspect of the Chinese politics by the students. Each presenter should select a research topic to be approved by the instructor by Week

4. Sample topics are: China's political parties; leading factions inside the CCP; the political role of Chinese military; corruption of the Chinese officials. Each presenter should conduct a collective research and write a report and, finally, make an oral presentation of no longer than 15 minutes to the class, followed by a 10-minute Q & A session. A written report (3 pages, single space or 5 pages, double space) is due on the day of the presentation.

Reading Report: You are required to write three (2-3 pages, single space) reading reports on McGregor, Wang 2005, and the foreign policy papers. The reports should be a critical summary of the book. No outside reading or research is needed. You are required to make a 10-minute oral presentation of one of your reports to the class on the specific due day.

Research Paper: You are required to write a research paper addressing one aspect of Chinese politics. Your paper topic must be submitted with a brief justification to the instructor by Week 4. It should have 18 double-spaced pages, excluding bibliography and cover page. The completed paper is due on the last day of class (Each student is required to also submit an electronic copy of the paper).

Participation/attendance is the instructor portion of your grade. It will be based on the quality and the quantity of your participation in class discussions and the Q&A sessions of the group project. The class will be a mixture of informal lecture and relaxed discussion. All views are welcome and those who participate actively will be rewarded appropriately. We all learn from each other's insights.
